

Tarara A., Anastasiadou S.

The Career Counselor and the Discovery of New Roles at Work

In this post-modern era of crisis and constant controversy, the career counselor holds a special place in counseling. As a profession, it is considered to be rather popular if it comes with a serious theoretical background and a continuously updated flow of information on education and employment.

Aiming at the client's professional fulfillment, differentiation and development, the counselor helps improve judgment, decision-making, planning, and activation. Guidance and support for the client is available at all times as s/he tries to uncover new professional roles within the framework of a successful professional course of action.

That is why a logical system is being developed through which the client can decide at a minimal cost about his/her professional development in line with his/her values, targets, interests, abilities, personal characteristics, and expectations. Through personal development, the client will be able to reorient his/her professional life solving problems that pertain to work or opting for a new job that suits him/her better.

The main points in the aforementioned evolutionary course is the development of self-perception and taking up roles involving professional appointments, the improvement of social skills, and the client's preparation to bolster his/her professional profile and respond satisfactorily to market needs.